

September 21 2011

Buckley, Christopher. Boomsday

After her father stakes (and loses) her tuition money on a dotcom startup, our heroine sheds her family name and takes to the blogosphere as Cassandra Devine. An aggressive, uber-caffeinated voice in the night, she unwittingly mobilizes her brethren into a battle with the ?Ungreatest Generation? ? their parents. The baby boomers are retiring en masse, buckling the social security system as they reach for their nine irons. Cassandra Devine is not prepared to foot the bill.

Her big idea to right the ship ? offer huge tax breaks to seniors who agree to kill themselves by age 65. She enlists Senator Randolph Jepperson to get the ?voluntary transitioning? bill on the floor. He wants a shot at the presidency. She wants a serious national discussion about social security reform. They both may be in over their heads as the issue goes viral.

Christopher Buckley brings his trademark wit to this irreverent comedy. The characters are eerily recognizable and the dialog lights up the pages. The author of ?Thank You For Smoking? hits another national nerve. Debt and social security issues have only become more ominous since this book?s publication, making it funnier still. Or does that make it less funny?

Reserve a copy

RA Blog Categories:

Popular Fiction

Fiction

Source URL: <http://www.hplibrary.org/bibliofiles/buckley-christopher-boomsday?page=18>